

Storing up Trouble

During the 1970s the decline of manufacturing industry in the west end of Newcastle accelerated. Factory closures meant growing unemployment, and they also left a legacy of derelict buildings and empty sites. "Storing up trouble" is a detailed account of what was replacing the former manufacturing industry – storage and distribution facilities for goods made elsewhere – and warned of the consequences of this for local job opportunities.

